ERRATUM.—In the article "Inklings," commencing in the third column of our first page, half way down the column, and in the sentence beginning, "Does the fact that most men are humble and ignorant," &c., for "rationable" read rational. It is one of those errors of type that will sometimes be overlooked in spite of the most careful reading.

CHRISTMAS.

Yesterday could not, under the circumstances, be made a very merry Christmas day with us, except among the thoughtless and boisterous fire-cracker urchins of the street. They kept up a terrible clattering and popping in front of our office, as their most eligible locality considering the mud and the rain. We could not in our hearts object to their enjoyment though it was sufficiently annoying to their seniors. The whizzing and snapping of the fire-crackers was the worst feature, but owing to the dampness of the day, or some other cause, it was impossible to "dry it up."

Vanity Fair, owing to the sickness of its publisher and the present exorbitant price of paper, goes into a monthly, till better times. The first No. is to be issued about the 10th of January, and thereafter the first of every month, at 10 cents per copy.

Ours is no longer, a "one horse town," nor a one dray town, as our old friend, W. Ashton has just set going a vehicle of the kind just named. We hope it will not now be quite so difficult to get a little job done in this line of business, as we have found it late.
